A biodegradable urn offers the opportunity to give something back to our planet. The very act of scattering cremated remains disseminates into nature the nutrients and minerals locked up inside our loved one's ashes. Using biodegradable urns can be a very humbling experience. The many people who choose to use biodegradable urns often feel like they are making a positive contribution to the natural circle of life, even more so than if they were to scatter the cremated remains from a non-biodegradable urn.

Sculpted bronze urns are decorative urns that are sculpted from solid bronze using the artist's lost wax method. This allows the bronze urn to take on a more 'artistic' feel, the urn being shaped into sculptures depicting scenes such as dolphins on the crest of a wave. A patina finish is generally applied to the bronze urn to give it a darkened appearance.

Each cloisonne urn is processed by detailed careful hand work where the complex copper thread patterns are put on the copper urn. The patterns are then formed by the copper threads and are ready to be filled with enamels which is brought to the right temperature. Special polishing stones are then used to complete the effect of the urn.

The stone that is used for the marble urns comes from the high valued stone caves in Asia. Big blocks of stone are separated and are processed with special moulds, until the final shape of the urn is formed. After this process, the urns are further finished and polished by hand. Since marble is a natural product there is no single urn that looks exactly the same.

The stone that is used for the marble keepsake urns comes from the high valued stone caves in Asia. Big blocks of stone are separated and are processed with special moulds, until the final shape of the urn is formed. After this process, the urns are further finished and polished by hand. Since marble is a natural product there is no single urn that looks exactly the same.
